Extract from Scott (2014) Agony and Avoidance: Pixar, deniability and the adult spectator. Journal of Popular Film and television. Vol. 42(3), pp.150-162 (see p. 159) ‘Where previous animated fairy tales had confined their dark sequences to discussions of “evil” by focusing on “witches,” in Toy Story 3, the dark questions raised rather than absolutely moral are existential. When Buzz insists: “there’s gotta be a way out” of the plastic bag, Mr. Potato Head says something somewhat shocking: “Oh, Andy doesn’t want us. What’s the point?”—a sentiment that reflects a brutal, almost suicidal nihilism. This nihilism is continually reconnected to questions of the material. As the toys consider how to escape the bag, Ham’s reply (“Ah, forget it. It’s triple-ply high density polyethylene!”) reminds us of the plasticity of the toys and causes us to consider whether ripping the bag is not itself a kind of violent, even genocidal, act for the plastic things with which we identify. What is more it reinforces the toys’ sense of doom, nihilism and anger at their fate.

1. Are there examples from other films/TV Programmes that relate to existentialism/nihilism? Are those characters usually male or female?

Watch the video Toxic Geek masculinity (20.21 mins)

Questions to think about/discuss

1. How is hypermasculinity defined the video?

2. How does antifemininity relate to the version of masculinity on display in this programme?
3. How do the men police each other’s behaviour? Can you think of other examples where this happens in other media/popular culture?

4. What is meant by the term subordinate masculinity?

5. How are women on the programme portrayed?

We will watch clips in the seminar from the documentary Ian Hislop’s Stiff Upper Lip - An Emotional History of Britain (to highlight some interesting ideas in relation to masculinity for discussion).

And https://learningonscreen.ac.uk/ondemand/index.php/clip/24199 (4.31 mins)

1. Do you think that the notion of the stiff upper lip still applies to masculinity or masculinities? Are there examples that reinforce/challenge this in popular culture/media?

2. Is there greater public emotional display for both males and females in popular culture/media?

Other questions

1. In groups, pick one male representation (this can be anything from a television programme to a gamer or YouTuber) that your group are familiar with and analyse them in relation to challenging/reinforcing stereotypes of masculinity.

2. In groups, see if you can apply the concept of existentialism to the representation of a male character in popular culture/media. (You could focus on something specific but NOT nihilism).

3. Discuss the masculinities that are on offer in popular culture? Are there any that dominate?

4. In groups, discuss what you could focus on in relation to the assignment
